McGuire vs. Carlen: back in the ACC?

by Brad Stinson

While sitting Monday a week ago watching (via television) Carolina struggle to an eight point loss to Furman, one of the most die-hard Carolina fans I know turned to me at the half and offered: "I'm tired of backing a loser."

The statement was certainly overdramatic in the face of eight previous 18-win or better seasons and the fact that the die-hard was back in the fold near the end of the game when things got close, but it does represent the frustration that many old Carolina fans feel over the decline in Carolina basketball.

The season has not been a good one for Carolina. Although Head Coach Frank McGuire has indicated over and over again he didn't expect a winning season this year, the record (14-12) is the worst USC has had since the 1965-66 season when they were 11 and 13. And it is not just the record that has suffered. Attendance for 15 home games this year averaged just slightly over 7600 per game despite the fact Carolina played more nationally ranked teams than ever before.

For Carolina fans who managed to make it to this year's games and who remember the old days when Carolina Coliseum was chocked full of rabid, screaming Gamecock fanatics for nearly every game, the excitement is gone. At the five or six home games I managed to attend this year, the place was like a morgue compared to yesteryears. It seemed I had heard more crowd noise at graduation exercises. That's why I had to laugh a little when McGuire, upon winning his 500th career victory earlier in the season against the Citadel, could say Carolina crowds really knew how to make a coach feel great. There can be little doubt that McGuire has noticed the waning exuberance of Carolina supporters.

What has gone wrong? Most fingers point to the fact that Carolina is no longer in the Atlantic Coast Conference. And the figures are there to back up the fingers. Carolina's high point in attendance averages was during the 1970-71 season, their last in the ACC. Even the year after when Carolina had its best record ever (24-5), attendance dropped off by nearly 200 fans a game. Since that time it has gotten noticeably worse each year. (Carolina's average attendance in 1970-71 was 12,523, and 12,327 in 71-72. Last year's attendance was down to just under 9,000 per game.)

Assistant Head Coach Donnie Walsh agrees with the ACC assessment. "What else could it be?" he asked. "We've got the same coaching, the same recruiting - so what do you think?" The point is well taken. It's not hard to remember when Carolina was still in the ACC. In the four years between 1968 and 1972, Carolina's last three in the ACC and its first as an independent, Carolina basketball let the air out of football in terms of excitement. Large numbers of fans waited overnight in long lines in hopes of getting close to the floor to see the Gamecocks beat the likes of North Carolina and N.C. State. Those traditional rivalries produced enough noise and excitement to rock the Carolina Coliseum in those years. The high pitch of emotion that rivalries induce is still visible at the intensely-competitive ACC matchups , as fans of various conference teams fill the coliseums in the Carolinas, Virginia and Maryland.

"...I don't see much of Frank at all, and I don't know him because I stay busy coaching football, trying to get athletes in here to improve the program--all the programs with the exception of basketball..."
--Coach Jim Carlen

McGuire (top) and Carlen

Today at Carolina, however, it's a different story. More often than not there are student tickets left over that are eventually offered to the public. Not once was Carolina able to sell out the coliseum this year - not even against nationally-ranked teams like Kentucky (who drew under 11,000 fans) and then number one ranked Michigan (who drew just over 10,000). Things are different now and nobody denies it. Most observers agree things are not going to change until Carolina gets back in "the" conference. Even Frank McGuire, a source close to the USC Board of Trustees tells me, is quoted as having said that very same thing.

When Carolina ducked out of the Atlantic Coast Conference after the 1970-71 season, most fans were convinced it was the right thing to do. Even Carolina's last-minute victory over UNC in the 1970-71 ACC Tournament failed to compensate for the previous year's tournament debacle. That was the year Carolina, undefeated in the conference and experiencing one of its greatest seasons ever, lost to N.C. State in double overtime during the final tournament game. Under NCAA rules then in effect, only the tournament winner was privileged to journey to the NCAA regionals, so the Carolina team, which had dominated regular conference play, was forced to sit on the sidelines while N.C. State represented the conference. Although McGuire is now quoted as saying he never really wanted to get out of the ACC, observers insist he was very disgruntled by the winner take-all tournament system and at least tacitly supported the move to independent status. Of course the NCAA tournament selection rules have changed since then and both the tournament winner and the regular season champion now receive bids. But back in '71 things were different and many Cock fans agreed it was time to shuck the conference and blaze an independent path to glory.

In the past year or so there's been a lot of talk about Carolina getting back into the ACC, but it's been mostly talk. Only the USC Board of Trustees can get Carolina back in, and even with McGuire's urging, the likelihood of that happening is slim at this point. Although a lot of fans go around talking about "when we get back in the ACC," the fact is that USC doesn't even have an application in for readmission. The only application that has been filed was withdrawn last summer by the USC Board of Trustees.

According to a source close to the board at that time, USC President William Patterson had just gotten off the phone with ACC commissioner Bob James when the trustee meeting began. He told the board members the North Carolina schools "are giving us the runaround," and Patterson then recommended the trustees withdraw the application. They followed the advice.

The same source says that since that time McGuire has requested the board submit a new application, but that has been about it. Even Patterson and the Board's chairman, T. Eston Marchant, admit the Board is not seriously considering application for re-entry at this time. "There is no agreement among Board members" on that subject, Marchant told me. And Patterson, who a month ago in an interview said

Thurmond vs. Warnke

by Val Stieglitz

There is nothing pleasant about the fact that the U.S. and the Soviet Union are armed to the teeth, but the existence of the fact raises fundamental questions of policy in both countries. In the U.S. the arms race has lead to a deep schism between those who see arms build-ups as necessary to security, and those who say that further build-ups threaten security. Senator Strom Thurmond has consistently taken the former position, and his opposition to the nomination of Paul Warnke as head of the Arms Control and Disarmament Agency and chief SALT (Strategic Arms Limitations) negotiator, reflects his doubt of the possibility, or desirability, of slowing down the arms race.

Thurmond was critical of the Warnke nomination from the day it was announced, and bases his opposition on several articles Warnke has written in the past few years. The accuracy of Thurmond's reading of the articles, however, is questionable. For example:

-Thurmond claims that Warnke is opposed to the development of new weapons systems, like the B-1 bomber and the Trident missile system. In fact, Warnke has criticized funding new systems out of pure reflex rather than rational need. The nuclear balance serves its purpose-stability-when a balance exists. Warnke thinks that rampant arms improvements bring war closer by upsetting the balance between American and Soviet capabilities. Warnke has made it clear that he favors maintaining the balance, but has added that one price of stability is a reduction in arms programs.

-Thurmond contends that Warnke believes in unilateral disarmanent on the part of the U.S. In fact, Warnke has consistently called for mutual restraint, and sees unilateral initiatives as one possible way of securing Soviet cooperation. He would consider a moratorium, for a six month period, on weapons programs, to encourage the Soviet Union to follow suit. If they did not, then the U.S. could proceed with no lost strategic advantage. In 1963, President Kennedy tried this tactic when he declared a moratorium on atmosphereic nuclear tests. The result was the Nuclear Test Ban Treaty, in which the Soviets cooperated.

> "...The controversy surrounding Warnke is part of a larger debate, national in scope, over American strategic policy. The Warnke nomination is merely one round in the fight..."

The controversy surrounding Warnke is part of a larger debate, national in scope, over American strategic policy. (In military parlance, "strategic" refers to nuclear forces.) The Warnke nomination is merely one round in the fight. The lines were drawn soon after it became clear that the USSR was engaging in a sustained military build-up. Over the past ten years, the Soviet military establishment has been growing about 3 percent per year. In many categories of weapons, they are pulling even with U.S. levels. This has agitated more than a few people, not all of whom are professional alarmists. Ex-Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld, for example, claimed that the Soviet Union is pushing for the capability to defeat the U.S. in an all-out nuclear war.

This is important because the balance, which Warnke wants to preserve, rests on both nations knowing that they cannot destroy the other. If the Soviets are going for a victory capability, then there is no more balance and things like the SALT agreements are worthless. It is then every nation for itself, and arms spending and deployments would skyrocket.

Thurmond feels that the Soviets are trying to upset the balance. Thus, although the Senate Armed Services Committee has no jurisdiction over the Warnke nomination, Thurmond pushed for the Committee to examine Warnke. Formal authority for passing Warnke before the full Senate rests with the Senate Foreign Relations Committee. On Feb. 11, Thurmond issued a statement urging that Armed Services question Warnke, saying that the whole thing was a national security issue and, therefore, of concern to Armed Services. Thurmond, of course, is on the Armed Services Committee. Warnke appeared before the Committee on Feb. 22 and 23 and received rough treatment from Thurmond, Henry Jackson (D-Wash.), Sam Nunn (D-Ga.), and Barry Goldwater (R-Ar.).

The key issue has been Warnke's alleged support of unilateral American disarmanent. Thurmond's Press Secretary says that "Warnke has indicated a preference for unilateral reductions." Thurmond has claimed that "he (Warnke) favors unilateral initiatives in strategic programs." Although Warnke has denied this interpretation of his views before both the Senate Foreign Relations Committee and Armed Services, the conservatives have persisted in this misreading.

Several conservative organizations lobbied against Warnke. A group called The Emergency Coalition Against Unilateral Disarmament was formed overnight to denounce Warnke, and placed a full-page advertisement in The Washington Post soliciting funds. Other organizations which support a U.S.

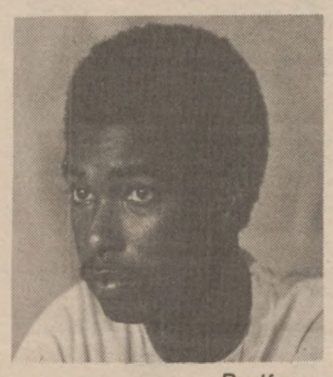
Redfern and the bottlers: cash and carry

South Carolina's glass manufacturing, bottling and canning industries have found an unusual ally in their fight to defeat bottle bill legislation now pending in the House of Representatives.

During this week's public hearing on the measure--which would require a five-cent deposit on all returnable and non-returnable bottles and cans containing soft drinks or beer--Redfern II, black activist and publisher of the Columbia weekly "Black News" (a.k.a. "Black On News"), appeared to oppose the bill.

The legislation, Redfern told members of the House agriculture and natural resources committee, would discriminate against "blacks and poor South Carolinians" by requiring a deposit that "is in fact a tax." The bill, Redfern argued, is "just one more piece of bureaucracy--just another government scheme." He said the bill would result in a loss of employment, that it would increase prices to consumers and would require additional tax dollars for administration.



Redfern

Goodstein

Mann

Redfern told the committee that rather than attempt to legislate against litter, the General Assembly should "encourage the American spirit and the tradition of going out and doing things voluntarily." "Don't try to regulate or put a deposit on the American spirit," he warned the committee. In his closing remarks, Redfern described Rep. Roger Martin, Republican minority leader of the Oregon House of Representatives, who came to the state at the request of the S.C. Environmental Coalition to describe Oregon's experience with a mandatory deposit law, as an "outside agitator" and admonished House and Senate members to devote their attention to South Carolinians who would be affected by the legislation.

There was something a little unreal about the entire performance. Here was a black activist--and former black radical--speaking on behalf of a group composed largely of conservative businessmen, mouthing homilies about the "voluntary" tradition of the American people and complaining about the presence of "outside agitators." A coalition between beer and soft drink manufacturers, cash-and-carry retailers, and a black activist. Strange bedfellows? It was obvious the white lobbyists and businessmen opposing the bill thought so; they sat quietly, some of them gazing at the floor, while their spokesman from the minorities did his thing.

Of all the arguments presented to the committee by the opponents, Redfern's seemed the weakest. While the corporate types argued that the state would lose tax revenues, destroy home-grown industries and the free enterprise system, put hundreds of skilled workers in the unemployment lines, etc., Redfern argued the bill would hurt the poor. But Oregon's experience seems to defy the logic of his argument. Beverage prices did not increase due to passage of the bill and a recent EPA study of 25 states says a net savings of 30¢ will be realized on returnables. In Oregon, the jobs created in the areas of distribution and handling of returnables more than offset any job losses in manufacturing--and Martin claimed during the hearing only two individuals had been located who actually lost their jobs due to the legislation. In any case, if jobs are lost, they will be at the $10,000-plus skilled labor level, while the jobs created will be at the $6000-$7000 level, so more jobs will be available for unskilled workers, i.e. "the poor." And the argument that the deposit is really a tax is weak--by redeeming bottles and cans, the poor (and everyone else) will at best realize a net savings over present costs--at worst they will break even. And the bill would make every bottle and can lying along the roadside worth a nickel. Redfern's final argument--that administration of the bill will require more tax dollars--doesn't hold water; the bill's sponsors say bottle bill legislation will require no funds for administration.

So what's Redfern up to? Beats us. But his support of the opponents of the bottle bill came as no real surprise. In the most recent edition of Redfern's "Black On News," published two days before the hearing, there's a front page interview with Leonard L. Price, president of Budweiser of Columbia, Inc., that goes on for dozens of inches laying out the entire case for the opponents of the measure.

And then there's the 66-inch Budweiser ad in the same issue.

Arnie's error

Senator Arnold Goodstein, our "kid in the candy store," was back in the news again last week with another of his quotable quotes. You know the kind -- the ones that make you wish you had stayed in bed that day.

Seems that activist Brett Bursey had stopped off at the ERA rally on the steps of the Capitol a little over a week ago on his way to testify at a Senate hearing on capital punishment. Bursey asked that the 200 or so persons gathered at the ERA rally attend the Senate hearing after the rally was over to demonstrate opposition to the death penalty.

Well, the ERA organizers and supporters were a bit miffed by Bursey's tying the two bills together and expressed the belief that associating opposition to the death penalty, which is expected to pass, with the ERA, which is expected to be close, could be damaging to the latter. In other words, politics as usual.

Goodstein, sponsor of the ERA Ratification Bill, was quoted as saying that he "knew of no tie in (between the two bills), other than the fact that women have also not been given an equal opportunity to die. There have been very few executions of women in this country."

"Chalk one up for our side," the opponents of the ERA are probably saying by now. "Keep the ladies out of the electric chair--vote against the ERA."

It's really kind of surprising to hear Goodstein making this kind of argument about the ERA. It's just the kind of argument that the supporters of the ERA have been trying to dispel ever since the battle for the new amendment began--arguments like mandatory combat duty for women and forced co-habitation of men and women in restrooms. And now this.

Goodstein, of course, is entitled to his opinion, but how he figures statements like these are going to help the cause is a mystery here. Goodstein seems, for one reason or another, intent on making the kind of statements that would be better left unsaid.

How Mann 'helps' his constituents

Almost three years ago, in the summer of 1974, James R. Mann, South Carolina's Democratic congressman from the Fourth Congressional District, cast a vote in the House Judiciary Committee to impeach a U.S. President for his involvement in a cover-up of unethical activities. Now Mann is having ethics problems of his own.

On February 27, the Washington Post reported Mann "has used the staff of his Congressional office in an unsuccessful attempt to rescue a failing Greenville, S.C. mail-order coin dealership in which Mann was a principal financial backer." The Post described Mann's connection with Greenvillian Ben Gause, president of the U.S. Coin Co., which Mann helped start with a $38,000 loan in 1974. Gause was found guilty of mail fraud earlier this year during a federal court trial in Greenville after it was determined he had failed to fill nearly $250,000 in orders for bicentennial coins.

The majority of the Post story dealt with favors Mann and his Congressional staff had performed for Gause during the past two-and-a-half years. Post reporter Rudy Maxa wrote that Mann and his staff affixed postage stamps to $30,000 worth of $2 bills during office hours for eventual resale by Gause; that they "ordered thousands of dollars worth of coins and bills from the office of the House sargeant-at-arms when Gause's companies experienced difficulty purchasing them elsewhere;" that they used House facilities and equipment to package coins for shipment to S.C.; that they carried coins and bills from Washington to Greenville for Gause; that they helped Gause "arrange a mailing address in Washington and subsequently delivered to him mailbags of checks" in response to national ads--ads that were later "judged to contain 'false representations' by postal authorities."

Maxa's story goes on to describe Mann's precarious financial situation, which Mann acknowledged was severe. Mann told Maxa he had had "terrible cash flow problems" in recent years.

According to Maxa, House rules forbid anyone from engaging in "commercial ventures and other non-governmental activities" in House buildings and House ethics standards require that a member "retain no one from his clerk hire allowance who does not perform duties commensurate with the compensation he receives."

Mann claims he was simply helping Gause out--performing services just as he would for any constituent who needed a helping hand. The fact that he was in bad financial shape and had $38,000 invested in Gause's business had nothing to do with it, Mann told the Post. "I had no more concern about my money than the man on the moon," he said.

While it is true Mann has developed something of a reputation for his willingness to go out of his way to help out constituents, it is simply ludicrous for Mann to maintain that the hundreds of hours he and his staff devoted to Gause's affairs were hours the Congressman would devote to any constituent.

The Congressman's apparent satisfaction with this transparent and absurd defense of his actions suggests a cynical contempt for the public--the kind of contempt many will agree was Richard Nixon's greatest sin. Someone somewhere should insist that the Congressional ethics committee investigate this matter--Rep. Floyd Spence is the committee's ranking Republican member. If such an investigation is not forthcoming, and Mann continues to stonewall it, then perhaps Piedmont voters will indicate to Mann that his cynicism is misplaced.

The POLITICAL ECONOMY

Loud, lewd rock music

by Ed Meadows

A capacity crowd filled the Carolina Coliseum last Sunday evening to hear the rock group Kiss. Now this fact has nothing to do with political economy. Nevertheless, it'll be my theme, for I love good, hard, mean, loud, lewd rock music, and I'm happy to see that Columbia has developed a rock audience of some sophistication (despite the heavy handicap imposed by the absence of a real progressive rock radio station).

I can recall passing through Columbia in the early '70s and attending a Frank Zappa concert at the decrepit Township Auditorium. It was a piddling affair, the audience scanty and moot; Zappa consequently bored and not at his best. But what a contrast Sunday night. The crowded Coliseum was a sea of longhaired kids, university people, some middle-aged folks, and even some mothers who brought children under the mistaken impression that Kiss was a girls' choir.

> "...On that night Kiss looked and sounded like a nuclear reactor would look and sound if it were a musical instrument..."

Now the rock concert is an established cultural custom, one developed during the 1960s in great rock concert halls such as the old Fillmore East of New York and in events such as Woodstock. And the custom has its rituals, most of which were duly observed Sunday night at the Coliseum. As is strictly de riguer, the air was thick with sweet marijuana smoke up where I sat, and those of us who came unstoned were not to remain that way. If you didn't get a contact high from breathing the smoke, there were joints being passed around--another time-honored and generous ritual. (Three different joints were being passed my way, and somebody even passed around his water pipe.)

By the time Kiss was about to appear, random waves of excitement passed through the audience, and when the lights were turned off, many people lit their cigarette lighters and held them up, giving the not unbecoming effect of a huge candlelight service. Then spotlights focussed on a rotating

by Nancy Mayberry

Illustration by Ruth Johnson

Rosewood Drive is a mess.

The South Carolina Highway Dept. (SCHD), the Richland County School District One board and the Shandon Neighborhood Council can all agree on that. The problems arise when someone starts talking about what to do about it.

The SCHD plans to expand Rosewood to five lanes and eventually extend it. The school board wants to be certain the project won't be harmful to the children attending A.C. Moore and Rosewood Elementary Schools. Shandon residents believe a wider road will hurt their neighborhood and would like to see Rosewood remain a 3-lane street.

Rosewood begins at Bluff Road in front of the state fairgrounds. It is in fine shape there. Six broad, well-maintained lanes accomodate traffic going to the fair, University of South Carolina football games and the State Farmer's Market.

The road changes decidedly after it crosses Assembly Street. The pavement is rough and patched. A yellow light flashes constantly to warn motorists to drive carefully as they go under a narrow railroad trestle. Rosewood continues as a two-lane road until it reaches Ott Road, just west of Rosewood Elementary School. At Ott it becomes a narrow four-lane highway until it curves north to join Beltline Boulevard.

People may complain about Rosewood Drive but this doesn't stop them from using it. According to a survey by the highway department, between 8,000 and 12,000 cars and trucks travel it daily. The figure rises to about 16,000 on the section near Beltline.

It is hard to say when someone first decided something needed to be done about Rosewood. Residents heard talk of it as far back as 30 years ago. In 1963, the Columbia City Council passed a resolution asking the highway department to make a study of the possibility of improving the road. The Columbia Area Transportation Study (COATS), begun a year later, provides a comprehensive traffic plan for the city. It recommends Rosewood be widened and extended.

Herman Snyder, a SCHD urban engineer, says his section of the department began work on the project about 1970. Plans now call for Rosewood to be extended south of Midlands Technical College across Gill Creek to Garners Ferry Road where it will tie into Wildcat Road. Of more immediate concern is the widening of the street. The project will provide four lanes for traffic and a turning lane, as well as curbs, sidewalks and a storm sewer on both sides of the street.

Inland Bridge Co., Chester, has been awarded a $1.2 million contract to expand the railroad trestle to accommodate a 5-lane road. The trestle is expected to be finished in about three years. SCHD has paid $1 million for land along Rosewood. Only one property owner has refused to grant right of way: Richland County School District One.

Thereby hangs our tale. Work can't begin until the school board signs over its land. Since the school board is balking, residents believe they still have time to convince the SCHD to make substantial changes in its plans.

"We really don't object to the project," says James L. Solomon, Jr. chairman of the school board. "What we are concerned about is the effect on the learning environment at Rosewood and A.C. Moore."

Dr. John Stevenson, associate superintendent for business affairs, says the board has made several requests of the highway department. At A.C. Moore, they have asked for the installation of a wall four to six feet high to serve as a safety barrier and to muffle sounds from the road. They have also asked the department to air-condition the school because the noise will make it hard for students to study.

The parents of pupils at Rosewood Elementary, which is further back from the street than A.C. Moore, have also asked for air conditioning but have received no official support from the school district. At Rosewood, the SCHD has agreed to erect a small concrete barrier between the road and the schoolyard and a controlled traffic light that a crossing guard will operate.

The need for air conditioning at A.C. Moore is the only point upon which the board and the highway department disagree--if this dispute could be settled, the school board would presumably acquiesce and SCHD could complete its right-of-way acquisitions. But the highway department isn't interested in air conditioning the school. "We feel like this would really set a precedent," Snyder says, arguing the SCHD cannot afford to air condition every school along every highway it builds in South Carolina.

Board chairman Solomon says the highway department has a survey that shows traffic on a wider street would not be much noisier than it is now, but a review by district staff members disagrees with these findings. In an effort to resolve the question, the District One board contracted with B.F. Goldberg and Associates, a Columbia engineering firm, to make a noise level survey. Stevenson says the $3000 report will be completed in about six weeks. "It may very well turn out they will come up with the same conclusion the highway department did; they may well not," he says.

If the Goldberg report disagrees with SCHD's assessment and the school district continues to refuse to grant right-of-way to the highway department, the matter will likely end up in court. Snyder says any decision about suing the school will be made by Paul Cobb, the chief highway commissioner, Edgar S. Coffey, the state highway engineer, and the 18-member highway commission.

District board chairman Solomon says "we don't wish to force anybody into court. We just want to insure an adequate learning environment to the children who attend our schools." Whether to refuse right-of-way "is a decision the board would have to make and I just don't know."

Should the two public entities--one an agency of the state, the other of the county--face off in court, the central issue will probably be whether the school district's request for air conditioning is a reasonable condition for granting right-of-way. A noise survey favorable to the school district's position, it is speculated, will strengthen their case. "We're not trying to impose on the highway department the renovation of our facilities," Solomon emphasizes. He says he believes the SCHD should air condition A.C. Moore simply because the widened highway is the reason air conditioning will be necessary.

Shandon residents are proud of their neighborhood. They have a right to be. Not so many years ago, it was beginning to deteriorate. Some property owners remember being advised not to buy houses there. Now, largely because of efforts made by people in the neighborhood, it is considered one of the nicer residential areas in Columbia. Members of the Shandon Neighborhood Council want to protect Shandon. They believe the SCHD's plans could make this much more difficult.

About 150 people attended a meeting of the council Feb. 22 at the Wesley Memorial United Methodist Church. After a Council committee studying the Rosewood situation presented a slide show and a report on the project, the group passed a resolution that agreed Rosewood Drive needs to be improved but asked the highway department to find other ways of doing it. According to the resolution, the design is unacceptable for several reasons:

Artist's rendering of Shandon council's proposal

"The proposed four through lanes and one turning lane would make Rosewood Drive a major traffic artery. The additional lanes and the increased clearance under the railroad bridge near Assembly Street would open Rosewood Drive to through truck traffic from the Bluff Road industrial area. Such an artery would destroy the residential character of the neighborhood on the north and south sides of Rosewood Drive. Neighborhood-oriented businesses, such as those in Rosewood Shopping Center, would in turn be hurt. Many businesses would lose parking spaces. Finally, A.C. Moore and Rosewood Elementary Schools would face increased hazards for children crossing Rosewood Drive, would lose part of their already small playgrounds, and would suffer increased noise pollution."

Tom Kohlsaat, a member of the committee that prepared the report for the Shandon council, says he believes there "creative alternatives" to the present plan for a five-land artery down Rosewood. "We clearly see the need for some kind of improvement in traffic conditions on Rosewood" he says, "but we want a design flexible enough to keep some of the things that make Rosewood Drive feel like home."

A draftsman working with Kohlsaat's committee has prepared a drawing of one alternative the council would like to see considered. The artist's rendering shows three lanes--one of which is a center turn lane-- running through the tree-lined section of Rosewood near A.C. Moore; the road widens to four lanes at the intersection of Rosewood and Harden: two lanes for east and westbound traffic, a turn lane in the center and another turn lane feeding into Harden Street (see illustration). "We're not highway engineers," Kohlsaat says, "and we don't know if this particular idea is feasible from an engineering standpoint. But we believe if the highway department were willing to approach the Rosewood project creatively, some compromise could be congestion problem and still retain the community atmosphere on the more residential portions of the street."

One of the committee's major objections to the project is that it will raise and widen the railroad trestle just east of Assembly Street. It has "profound implications for the whole street," Kohlsaat says. The structure, which is 11 feet 3 inches high, is too low for many trucks to go under it. If it is raised, residents believe it will greatly increase the truck traffic, and noise, on Rosewood. "The highway department says truck traffic down Rosewood will not be greatly increased," Kohlsaat says, "but we disagree." Kohlsaat believes the highway is looking five to ten years into the future, when a southeastern beltway will sweep below the Shop Road-Stadium Road area and draw truck traffic in the Shop Road industrial area away from Rosewood. "But by the time the beltway is completed--if it is ever completed," Kohlsaat says, "truck traffic down Rosewood will have already had a severe impact on the surrounding residential communities.'' The expansion of the trestle, Kohlsaat admits, will probably occur whether or not SCHD's plans for a five-lane expansion are carried out. And Kohlsaat's supposition was confirmed this week by James Cooper, Jr., a superintendent with Inland Bridge Company which has been awarded the bridge contract. Cooper says the company hopes to start work on the trestle by March 10.

When Shandon residents talk about their hopes for changing the project, one of the things they mention is the number of influential public officials who live in the neighborhood. Two of them are Rep. Jean Toal, D-Richland, and Rep. Bill Campbell, D-Richland. Both see a need for revisions in the plans for Rosewood.

The council, Toal says, is "trying to preserve the integrity of residential life in the inner city. What the highway department is doing to Rosewood is to accommodate it totally to truck traffic."

"It basically boils down to whether

Why Jim Carlen doesn't know Frank McGuire...

Carolina roundball on the decline

he hoped to get McGuire back into the conference before he retired as president of USC, now confesses the chances of that happening are "rather unlikely."

Walsh believes that had the application not been withdrawn last summer Carolina would be back in the ACC now. But that subject is open to substantial debate. At least five ACC member schools must consent to Carolina's readmission, and sources say several of the schools don't want USC back in under any circumstances. Allegedly one of the reasons the USC board decided to withdraw the ACC application was that during the time Carolina was trying so hard to get back in, they learned the ACC was sending out "indirect feelers" to Georgia Tech suggesting that it might be a good idea if Tech applied for membership.

Other observers, however, claim the trustees are not the biggest reason Carolina is not back in the ACC. Instead, they say, the fault lies with head football coach and athletic director, Jim Carlen. It's no secret that Carlen doesn't want back in the ACC and the fact that the Board of Trustees decided to make him athletic director last fall for all sports except basketball is indication that the board is willing to abide by his wishes.

Last summer, when the Board withdrew the ACC application, Carlen was quoted as saying financial reasons were behind his desire to remain independent. One state sportswriter suggests Carlen figured he could make more money for the athletic program outside the conference, playing teams like Tennessee, Georgia and Florida State, than he could inside the ACC, playing teams like Wake Forest, Virginia and Duke. The argument seems to have little merit, though, when you consider that next year's schedule, according to Carlen, has five ACC teams on it - everyone but Virginia and Maryland. And Carlen says USC has had Virginia on the schedule since it left the ACC and the situation with Maryland is that they wouldn't play the Gamecocks "under any circumstances" because of a "falling out--personality wise" the two schools had long before he came here.

The other financial argument going around is that Carlen figures, as an independent, USC gets to keep all the money collected from bowl appearances and TV coverage, whereas Carolina would have to share that money with other conference teams if USC was in the ACC. This argument is a little harder to shoot down. Carlen's team picked up around $80,000 from Carolina's Tangerine Bowl bid during his first year as head coach in 1975 and received some $360,000 for two regionally-televised games last year. As an independent, all that money stays in Carolina's coffers. Had Carolina still been in the ACC, the school -in the case of a regional TV hookup - would have received a flat fee of $50,000 for being a participant in the game and the rest would have been divided equally among the ACC schools, including Carolina.

Walsh disagrees with the financial arguments. "Yes, we get to keep all that money as an independent," he said, "but what difference does it make unless we get a bowl bid every year?" Walsh says if you consider only the short-run for football, then the financial argument may hold water, "but if you ask what is best for Carolina over the next 20 years in all sports, I don't see where we are benefiting by it."

"You can't treat a college program like a professional program," Walsh added. "You can't just look at finances. Our whole program would flourish in the ACC and even if we did lose a little money, we are not suffering. We've got a one-million dollar Gamecock Club, and the athletic department at USC is sound--which is something many other schools are not able to say."

"...You can't treat a college program like a professional program. You can't just look at finances. Our whole program would flourish in the ACC and even if we did lose a little money, we are not suffering..."

--Coach Donnie Walsh

Although Walsh is quick to point out that the relationship between the basketballers and the footballers at USC is good, one wonders if the difference in opinions regarding the ACC--especially McGuire's present fervor for getting back in the conference hasn't caused some animosity. Even if it hasn't, McGuire's got to be a little puzzled by the board's deference to Carlen after only one year at Carolina. After all, McGuire is the one who made winning a tradition at USC and he has been doing it for a hell of a long time.

Talking to Carlen now, however, one is led to believe that the board's decision had nothing to do with deference to him. Carlen declined to second guess the board's decision, saying, "I work for the Board of Trustees and I go up there and give them my opinion and they make a decision. I don't think I ought to go out in public and challenge their decision whether its for me or against me." Carlen did say, though, that it didn't make any difference to him whether Carolina is in the ACC or not. His major concern, he said, was whether he could get a good schedule without being in a conference and, he adds, "we've got a heck of a schedule." Moreover, Carlen points out that USC is playing five of the ACC conference teams anyway. If Carolina were in the ACC they would only be required to play six of the ACC teams, so Carlen says "no, it doesn't matter to me if we're in the ACC or not."

Carlen denies, now, that financial considerations are his major concern and contradicts the idea that the USC sports program suffers overall by not being in the ACC. "We have a good schedule in all other sports," he said. "Our tennis team is playing ten out of the top 12 teams in the east, our track team is competing against Georgia and Tennessee, which are two of the really tough teams, in addition to competing in the ACC. In swimming we compete with North Carolina and N.C. State, who came out first and second in the ACC last year. In baseball we were second in the nationals two years ago and last year we went to the regionals. We're playing 70-game schedule including every good team in the south, so I don't know where we are hurting."

Carlen also denies that a difference in opinions about the ACC has caused trouble between his sports program and that of Frank McGuire's. "I wouldn't think so," he said. "I don't see much of Frank at all, and I don't know him because I stay busy coaching football, trying to get athletes in here to improve the program--all the programs with the exception of basketball. Coach McGuire is the Athletic Director for basketball." (Carlen is AD for all other sports). "I don't control him at all. He controls the basketball schedule, the whole thing. He's his own AD. I have no bone to pick with anybody in public. Whatever the basketball coach feels like--and that's the only program we don't control--I think he's got his privilege to have his opinion. I make my opinions known to the Board and if they vote my way or against me I'm going to accept it. I think that's part of it."

It's not hard to imagine why Carlen now seems so nonchalant about USC's re-entry into the ACC. Carlen really enjoys the best of both worlds. He not only remains independent, with whatever benefits that derives, but he also plays the ACC teams without any of the financial disadvantages it brings to member schools. While some observers charge that he is selfishly looking out only for his own programs, Carlen just cruises along minding his own business. He is right in saying that he has no control over Board decisions, but he must also realize that he can pull a lot of weight with the trustees.

There is nothing wrong with Carlen looking out for football first. It's his bag, his bread and butter. It's what he gets his name in the paper for. It's what he cares most about. He can't be blamed because he doesn't give a damn about basketball. He enjoys the rivalry the ACC teams provide without having to share his half of the deal and at the same time he can go out and rustle up games with big name teams like Tennessee and Notre Dame and end up in a highly-profitable regionally televised game. The sports networks know long before the season who they are going to televise, and who do you think they are going to pick? Virginia or Notre Dame? Carlen's no fool.

One of the problems that USC's Board of Trustees has had in the past and continues to have even now is that they are wishy-washy. They're afraid not to placate everybody so they don't do anything. It's been so long since Carolina has had one Athletic Director that it's hard to remember who the last one was. At least now they have cut back to just two-two years ago during Carlen's first year there were three-but the whole idea of having more than one person responsible for the good of the athletic programs allows differences like this to exist. Of course, two strong personalities like Carlen and McGuire are not likely to defer to one another. But perhaps an outside third party could accomplish what a mixed-bag cannot.

Yet with all the denials of hard feelings between the football and basketball programs, there seems to be a bitter undertone. Much of it probably stems from the frustration McGuire and his staff feel over their declining program. It's got to be embarrassing for McGuire, with the prestige and clout he has developed over his many years in basketball, not to be able to recruit the best players in the country on his name alone or to be undercut by teams whose major claim to fame, at least a few years ago, was being in the ACC.

So with the chances of ACC affiliation growing dimmer, McGuire has been forced to resort to other means to restore what was once a powerhouse in college basketball. He was quick to mention when he won his 500th victory that the job was not over and that he wanted to bring a national championship to Carolina. Walsh says they have been talking to the ACC schools about the possibility of playing at least some of them next year, and the schedule has been left open for just such a possibility. McGuire will go to the ACC tournament this week as a guest of Dean Smith and will confer with the conference coaches on that subject.

"...There's nothing wrong with Carlen looking out for football first. It's his bag, his bread and butter. It's what he gets his name in the paper for. He can't help it if he doesn't give a damn about basketball..."

Walsh seems to think the chances are very good and, as everybody knows, Carolina has already reinstituted its series with Clemson. Although he couldn't say who or how many games might be scheduled, he did say that the response from Maryland and N.C. State had been negative while Duke, Virginia and Wake Forest were more open about the idea. Believe it or not, Walsh says North Carolina is "the best friend Carolina has" in the ACC. Although Dean Smith (of North Carolina) and McGuire agreed years ago it was best to drop the series between the schools because of the animosity that had developed between the players and the fans, Walsh says they (Smith and McGuire) have maintained a good relationship. "They felt," Walsh said, "the two schools could help each other out better in other ways than playing each other in basketball, like in recruiting. But we need to convince him (Smith) now that the best way he can help us is by playing us in basketball."

What Carolina would like, of course, is to play the schools on a home-and-home basis, but the talk now, according to Walsh, centers more around the idea of a single game with one or more of the ACC teams on a neutral court. That is not going to do much for dwindling fan support at Carolina Coliseum, if this year is any indication, but old "Gamecock" fans would probably prefer it to no game at all. And as Walsh correctly points out, it's a start. "It could lend itself to Carolina getting back into the ACC," he said. Maybe when the ACC schools see one or more of the other teams in the conference getting the opportunity to fry the Cocks" again, it will encourage readmission into the league.

Walsh further points out that Duke and Virginia have both played in the Carolina Classic since Carolina got out of the ACC, even though they never actually played USC because the two teams lost their semi-final games, but he still admits it's not all positive. "They (the ACC teams) are concerned about records and prestige," Walsh said. "They don't want to play us unless they have to. Why should they play what is essentially another ACC team and possibly lose when they can schedule someone else and win." Walsh said they figure they have enough tough games in the conference without going outside the conference.

Even without the ACC teams, Carolina has a good schedule shaping up next year. It includes such nationally recognized teams as Alabama, Kentucky, Southern Cal, Louisville, Marquette and Notre Dame. They also play in the Cable Car Classic with a shot at presently-ranked number one San Francisco. In addition there is the long overdue Clemson series and the continuing rivalry with Furman. While there has been talk about dropping one or both of the games with Furman, supposedly because of the poor crowd behavior that greeted Carolina when they played in Greenville this year, USC would be foolish to drop what is presently Carolina's best rival. It should be noted that the Furman game at Carolina Coliseum this year was third in attendance only to Kentucky and Michigan with over 9,800 people.

Whether or not Carolina is going to be able to re-establish a successful basketball program both in terms of winning and support remains to be seen, but being out of the ACC - regardless of how tough it makes it for USC - is not an excuse Frank McGuire should be willing to hang his hat on. Old Carolina fans have had to suffer through two consecutive seasons knowing that the basketball year ends with the last regular season game. Now begins the waiting for next year and whatever promise it holds. With another good recruiting year and a little help from the fans Carolina Coliseum could once again come alive with excitement. Let's hope so.

reflecting globe, and flecks of light whirled through the cavernous hall. Feet began stomping, louder and louder, and then a firecracker went off and soon an electric guitar exploded through the air with an angry, mean chord that could've cut through a lead blockhouse, after which two more guitars and drums crashed in with searing harmony and hot little lead riffs. The air was charged with high voltage and multicolored lights flashed, changing quickly, illuminating the musicians as they entered in a cloud of pink fog, wearing tight black outfits, dazzling with rhinestones. They pranced and strutted and prowled in their costumes, one with his face painted bizarrely, the others decadent enough. All the while they blazed away at their instruments, loud and heavy, full of high energy, really transcendental.

On that night Kiss looked and sounded like a nuclear reactor would look and sound if it were a musical instrument. The stage burned red hot, like a molten reactor core, just one micromillimeter below critical mass. (And for it's really smashing numbers, Kiss didn't just rely on the loudest drums. No, the band hyphenated the flashiest numbers with actual explosive charges.)

The audience built to frenetic climaxes, enraptured by the electronic energy slicing through the air. At times it looked like a cross between a candlelight service and a Hitler youth rally. Kiss sensed that this audience was a good one, and the lead singer said so, called it one of the best of the tour. They did two encores and ended amidst flaming lights, explosions, the smashing of the lead guitar and hot, fast chords.

It was catharsis. And to me, there is no more exciting entertainment in the world than live hard rock music at its best. Some haute rock critics would belittle the theatrical, glitter rock of Kiss, but it matches the music and it's done masterfully and it's great showmanship. The legendary, brilliant masters of this art form, artists such as David Bowie or the Rolling Stones, don't ever appear in cities as small as Columbia, but Kiss was nearly every bit their equal, and may have the best rock show on tour this season.

These kinds of concerts are what rock music is about. The raw energy, electrified and amplified, riding on a primal beat, penetrates the being and makes connections with the deepest rhythms of the body's inner life. It is a sensual music, a music to electrify the soul, song of the Electronic Age.

In McLuhan's terminology, hard rock music, real heavy metal, is the hottest of all mediums. And its energy is filtered out in the debaucheries of sound recording. Worse even, television makes it a charicature. Rock is too hot for so cool a medium. Thus one sees rock musicians jumping around on TV, and shots of the audience going half crazy, and one wonders what strange instinct makes them do this. They merely look foolish, for the energy, the energy they're reacting to and feeding off, is lost in the television tube. It's missing. No, rock music has to be seen and heard live--blazing live and gaudy and hot, as it was Sunday night at the Kiss concert.

we're going to continue to rip up the city to solve peak traffic hour problems for people living outside the city," Campbell says.

"I'm sure the highway department would be willing to evaluate any alternative but I'm not sure there is a good alternative to widening Rosewood Drive," Snyder says. Snyder is aware that residents are worried about Rosewood becoming a major traffic artery, but "I can assure you, Rosewood Drive is already a traffic artery. If we don't widen Rosewood the traffic will start filtering through other residential streets." Most of the streets, he says, are in the Shandon section.

"The highway department understands their concern for the environmental effects," Snyder says. However, he also says the main cause of air pollution from cars is "queueing up. Air pollution is probably worse with the 2-lane section because of the congestion."

As for eliminating parking, "the fact remains we have already acquired the right of way." Even if the road only has three lanes, Snyder says the SCHD would probably not permit parking on its right of way.

As for the Shandon Neighborhood Council's suggestion that Rosewood be widened to three lanes rather than five, Snyder says it "would not be easy to change the size of the project." Such a change would require the approval of the department and the COATS policy committee, a local group that determines the priorities of road projects. Since 70 percent of the project is paid for by the national government, Snyder says any change in plans would also require the approval of the Federal Highway Administration.

"I feel like it's a badly needed project, and I hope the residents out there can see fit to let us go ahead with the project without delaying it to any great extent," Snyder concludes.

Statements by Kohlsaat and other Rosewood area residents indicate Snyder's hopes may not be realized. Kohlsaat says he has refused to accept the argument that the project is too far along to be significantly altered. Other communities, he says, have succeeded in holding up projects until some compromise has been reached, "and we aren't about to give up."

Meanwhile, the expansion project will apparently be reviewed by the Richland County legislative delegation. Toal and Campbell both say they will bring it before the group.

FOREIGN AFFAIR

arms build-up - The Committee on the Present Danger, The American Security Council, and The Coalition for a New Foreign and Military Policy - also denounced the nomination. Thurmond's Washington office denies that he participated in any of these groups, but did say the Senator had been in touch with many "concerned people." Thurmond's Press Secretary also said that Thurmond "feels as strongly about this nomination as he did about Sorenson's," and was in touch with several other Senators trying to round up opposition. Thurmond, of course, was in the middle of the successful fight to kill the nomination of Theodore Sorenson as head of the CIA.

At issue here are two views of the ways of achieving American military security. Thurmond and his ideological kin believe that the surest road to security lies in spending even more money on even more sophisticated weaponry, thereby to be prepared for whatever the Soviets might possess. Warnke represents the view that security will result from both nations realizing they cannot beat the other in a nuclear war. In order to sustain this mutual perception, weapons advances which give one side an advantage must be avoided. Balance means exactly that; balance.

Warnke advocates American preparedness. What he does not advocate is the idea that more weapons spell better defense. In the nuclear age, less can mean best; especially when the less means keeping the balance intact.

events & entertainment

Cinema

ATLANTIC I THEATRE, 3220 Two Notch Road, 786-0790.

"Young Students" and "Around the World With Johnny Wadd" are featured. Both are rated X and continuous shows begin at 11 a.m.

ATLANTIC II THEATRE, 3220 Two Notch Road, 786-0790.

"One of a Kind" and "Orgy, American Style" are two more X rated features that begin at 11 a.m. to run continuously.

CAROLINA THEATRE, 1417 Main Street, 252-8011.

More kung fu enters with "Exit the Dragon, Enter the Tiger." No showtimes were available as of this printing.

COLUMBIA EAST I THEATRE, 7369 Garner's Ferry Road, 776-0350

"Fun With Dick and Jane" starring George Segal and Jane Fonda hits Columbia at two theatres. This supposedly "way-out, wacky comedy" also brings Johnny Carson's side-kick, Ed McMahon, to the big screen.

COLUMBIA EAST II, THEATRE, 7369 Garner's Ferry Road, 776-0350

"Silver Streak" moves over from theatre I. Gene Wilder, Jill Clayburgh, Ned Beatty, Patrick McGoohan and Richard Pryor on the classy "AmRoad Silver Streak" heading for Chicago. Rated PG.

DUTCH SQUARE NORTH THEATRE, Dutch Square Mall, 798-1110

"Fun With Dick and Jane" with George Segal and Jane Fonda starts here also.

DUTCH SQUARE SOUTH THEATRE, Dutch Square Mall, 798-1110

"Network" is a what if movie. What if there was a fourth TV network that was doing so badly in the ratings it took its veteran anchorman, facing a mental breakdown, and show-cased his messianic proclamations in a hit news show. The movie is frighteningly plausible except toward the end when it carries the theme to its illogical extreme, but screenwriter Paddy Chayevsky seems to have something of a messiah complex himself: the film suggests that if the monomaniac corporate thinkers behind television would but heal their lack of decency and values, America's screwed up life style would follow suit. It's glib, but director Sidney Lumet keeps the messagy dialogue from sounding preachy and the film is expertly acted by William Holden, Faye Dunaway, and Robert Duvall.

FOX THEATRE, 1607 Main Street, 254-5212.

Features "Wizards" which replaces "The Sentinel" for its first Columbia showing. Sorry, but no showtimes were available.

GAMECOCK I THEATRE, Parkland Plaza Shopping Center, 796-0022.

"The Pink Panther Strikes Again" strikes again in the Columbia area in yet another theatre starring Peter Sellers as the invincible detective. It's rated PG, but there were no showtimes available.

GAMECOCK II, THEATRE, Parkland Plaza Shopping Center, 796-0022.

"The Search for Noah's Ark" has apparently ended because this week features "Executive Action." Again, no showtimes.

JEFFERSON SQUARE THEATRE, Jefferson Square, Downtown, 254-6731

"A Star is Born." Barbra Streisand plays a love story with herself in this gambit to jerk audience tears by showing what noble sufferer she really is. Kris Kristofferson is incidentally on hand (and giving his best performance) as the washed-up superstar lover who launches Esther Hoffman to fame and glory, but it's Barbra's show and her ploys for the audience' sympathy toward the end of the picture mash the surprisingly good writing and direction by Frank Pierson. It's Streisand without the freshness that made her great. With Gary Busey, Paul Mazursky. PG. 1:15, 4, 6:45, and 9:30.

MIRACLE THEATRE, 1229 Main Street, 779-0826.
